Small colleges referred to as a "refuge for education"

"Quality education has passed from our rich and prestigious universities to small liberal arts colleges." So stated a retired professor in a recent feature for The Blade of Toledo, Ohio. The author, Richard Taylor, wrote the article after 33 years of tenured professorships in large universities and nine visiting professorships in small colleges.

Taylor traced the development of colleges since the 1950's, when large universities began emphasizing research and publication. In contrast, he pointed out that small colleges "are still primarily dedicated to educating young adults."

Taylor contrasted his experience in the classroom. In the large university, he primarily conducted huge lecture classes and had his grading done by graduate students. On the other hand, in the small college he enjoyed limited class sizes and felt that he was better able to teach his students to think. He found more opportunities to touch their lives and help them to become better people.

As a small, liberal arts college, Michigan Christian College is dedicated to teaching and to providing a personal learning environment for students. Classes are generally smaller in size, permitting greater interaction with instructors. Faculty members are exceptionally qualified and able to know students by name. Year after year, they touch the lives of their students both in and outside of the classroom.

Summer campaigners travel to Germany

Students from Michigan Christian College joined campaigners from two other Christian colleges this past summer for a six-week campaign in various European countries. The MCC team focused its efforts in Hildsheim, West Germany.

The campaign team used the "Let's Start Talking" series as a basis for their work. Under this system, campaigners offer individuals an opportunity to practice English skills by using the Bible as a text in conversational classes.

Commenting about her experience with the campaign team, Laura Day, a junior counseling major from Marshall, Michigan stated, "Germany helped us see a new way in which we could serve. We found a new talent, and in that talent, we were able to influence many people."
